SM-562
Ching Tenant House
Leonardtown
Private

c. 1920s

On October 13, 1922 Joseph H. Ching purchased a .135 acre lot on the west side of Pope Street in Leonardtown, Maryland. Sometime during his ownership (but before 1928), a two story frame house was constructed on the property (a one story ell was added later). The house, however, has not served as the residence for many of the tract's owners. According to Ed Stokel, a local historian, the house has been rented out to a variety of local laborers and workers since it was initially constructed. Past owners include James J. and Leila C. Norris, Rose P. Nuthall, William and Agnes Mattingly, and J. Richard and Elizabeth C. Norris.

— The house, itself, represents a rare building type in the town. Its current orientation, although altered, is on a east-west axis with a gable front entry on the east elevation. This type of arrangement is uncommon in Leonardtown. While the house is currently covered with aluminum siding, the house's overall form, orientation, and fenestration remain significant character defining architectural elements.

The Ching Tenant house is located on the west side of Pope Street and about 40 yards north from the intersection of Pope and Shadrick Streets in Leonardtown, Maryland. The building is currently oriented on a east/west axis and situated a small 5610 sq ft lot that slopes slightly to the southwest.

This frame dwelling, constructed in the 1920s, consists of a two story main section and a later one story addition on the south elevation is distinguished by its relative lack of exterior decoration. Resting on a masonry foundation, the building is sheathed with aluminum siding and the cornice is enclosed. The roof of the main section is covered with raised seam metal, while the roof of the one story section is covered with asphalt shingles. Evidence in the form of a patch on the roof of the main section suggests that a centrally located interior brick chimney flue was removed at some time.

The building is currently oriented on an east-west axis. The gable-front or east elevation consists of a door on the first floor sheltered by a gable roof door hood and a six-over-six, double-hung sash window on the second floor. Evidence found on the south elevation, namely the presence of different types of windows found on the first and second floors, suggests that the house was originally oriented on a north-south axis. A first floor window on the building's south elevation is a modern two-over-two window while the second floor window, butted against the eave of the roof, is an original six-over-six windows. This evidence points to the replacement of a door (or doors) on the south elevation with window(s) when the one story addition was added. The original appearance of the south elevation, therefore, would have presented two doors on the first floor with two windows aligned right above them on the second floor. The replacement of other windows on the building, however, may merely point to a modernizing campaign and not to a reorientation.

Further investigation is needed to support/refute these findings.
